Old Times.

Ed. Eegister-How often we see in some newspapers articles written ridiculing old-time sayings, and old-time signs. In the early days, when we had no signal service stations, man, woman and child was thought to notice all the unusual occurrences that would come under their notice, and would learn to predict what the weather would be on the morrow. If the sun set red, or if it set behind a cloud, or if there were mock suns, or if, in the morning when the sun rose, it rose clear, and went behind a cloud, or if there were sundegs on each side of the sun, we would make predictions for the day; and I do not know but they were about as correct as those predicted by those employed by the government

And, then, animals and birds, and some kinds of plants, would indicate or forecast the weather. Every old hunter, every old frontiersman, could tell you what he thought of the weather prospect, and in almost every case his look for those turkeys; for a turkey alforecasts would be correct. For instance, if, in the morning, the birds were restless and very noisy-especially blue-jays and red-birds-you might ust as well take your overcoat or umbrella along if you were going somewhere; and if, on looking up to the sky, you saw an eagle way up so high he looked no larger than your hand, and just standing still, or just poised in the air, you had better begin to get up a good wood pile, if in the winter, or, if it was in haying time, you had better tains roosting in big timber."
